Excellence in Higher Education

As we have begun to embark on a new semester I am reminded that we are on a journey. In this case, an academic journey. One that will (hopefully) take us to new academic heights. We will encounter, learn, grow, and discover new things in new ways. This journey however, is not always one that take us from point A to point B. We mostly likely won't travel in a straight line. There will be hills and valley, mountains to climb, and streams to wade through.

We will have both difficult and exhilarating experiences on this journey. Our experiences will be unique, but we won't be alone.

My semester started in a major valley, or maybe you could say with a swift fall off of a cliff.

I got a terrible phone call informing me that my best friend of 25 years had passed away in a freak car accident. This made for a tough start to the semester. But alas, the journey continues. The semester didn't stop because I had a terrible life experience. Yes, my co-workers and students were caring and understanding. The academic calendar? Not so much. The days kept turning and beckoned me to go on. To be a good teacher, mentor, and boss. This is the point. Each of us will experience different things some good, some great, some not so great, or even terrible. We must keep afloat though, we must push on. We must not give up, but press on toward the goal of learning and obtaining a college degree.

It may be hard, but don't give up!
